

Is Your Super Bowl Marketing Campaign Playing by the Rules? 5 Tips to Help You Avoid Getting a Penalty

Legal Alert
January 30, 2024

With the Super Bowl coming up, it is important for brands looking to capitalize on football-themed promotions to remember that the terms “Super Bowl” and “Super Sunday” are registered trademarks guarded by the National Football League (NFL) more closely than a shutdown corner on a wide receiver.

Because there is a fine line between permissible fair uses of the phrases “Super Bowl” and “Super Sunday” (e.g., in on-air banter and news and sports reports) and impermissible promotional uses that may infringe the NFL’s trademarks, here are some reminders to keep you from going “offsides”:

1. Avoid promotional association. Do not mention the Super Bowl or use the Super Bowl logo in your advertisements, social media posts, labeling or packaging in such a way that the viewer, listener or consumers may infer a relationship between your food or beverage brand or products and the NFL that does not exist. Unless you secure a license from the NFL, you cannot use any advertisement of that nature. For example, you cannot say, “Your go-to beverage for the Super Bowl,” or even “We have all your Super Bowl party needs.”
2. Steer clear of other prohibited terms, logos, and images. In addition to “Super Bowl” and “Super Sunday,” do not mention or use the logo of the NFL, the American Football Conference (AFC), the National Football Conference (NFC) or any of the league’s teams, including a mascot. Moreover, avoid using the names or pictures of specific players, as this may trigger enforcement action from both the NFL and the players themselves.

Contact

Joshua A. Bloomgarden
Hillary H. Hughes
Erika G. Johnson
Nancy V. Stephens

Related Services

Commercial & IP
Transactions
Consumer Brands
Copyright & Trademark
Fashion & Apparel
Food & Beverage
Sports, Arts & Entertainment

Is Your Super Bowl Marketing Campaign Playing by the Rules? 5 Tips to Help You Avoid Getting a Penalty

---

3. Educate advertisers and marketing partners. Your advertisers or marketing vendors may want to organize tie-in promotional events with the Super Bowl, like “XYZ Super Sunday Sweepstakes.” Inform your vendors that the NFL is likely to send both you and them a nastygram (at a minimum) if they associate your brand or productions commercially with the big game.
4. Be careful with event branding. Don’t use the “Super Bowl” or “Super Sunday” name in sponsoring or promoting gameday-related events, such as “XYZ’s Super Bowl Party.”
5. Apply the same caution to team references. All NFL team names (e.g., “49ers,” “Chiefs,” etc.) and nicknames (and logos), like “Super Bowl,” are registered trademarks, so the same considerations of avoiding promotional association apply. Even using team colors could draw the ire of the NFL.

Some creative ways that brands have tried to keep both feet in bounds in their promotions include using statements such as “The Big Game,” “The Big One,” “Gametime,” “The Big Matchup” or “Football’s Favorite Day”; referencing the date of the game (e.g., “The February Football Finale”), the names of the cities/states of the teams competing in the Super Bowl (e.g., “San Francisco” or “Kansas City”); or making fun of the fact that they are prohibited from mentioning “Super Bowl” (e.g., by bleeping it out or by saying “the game that shall not be mentioned”).

Remember, advertisers literally pay millions of dollars to be associated with the Super Bowl. Their willingness to pay reflects the substantial commercial goodwill that the NFL has developed in the game. The NFL tenaciously protects its investment by policing unauthorized use of its trademarks, so take caution in how you reference the Super Bowl in your marketing campaigns to avoid getting blindsided.