As a guide and advisor to startups and their investors on legal and business challenges, Sinjin combines deal experience and legal project management to provide practical solutions.

Sinjin counsels emerging growth companies and investors on a broad range of transactional matters, from venture capital financings (debt and equity) to mergers and acquisitions, and general business matters. In his role as corporate lawyer, he acts as outside general counsel for startups and emerging companies, providing legal, business and strategic advice throughout their lifecycle, including startup structure formation, corporate governance, incentive compensation plans, and compliance with federal and state securities laws and regulations. Sinjin also represents venture capital funds and in connection with their equity investments in emerging growth companies.

Sinjin has represented clients in a variety of industries, with a focus on food and beverage and CPG, and including manufacturing companies, technology companies, Indian Tribe economic development companies, logistics and transportation companies, and warehouse and cold storage companies.
