"Changing market conditions are having a dramatic impact on the commercial real estate industry, making retail the new darling as other asset classes struggle with oversupply and changing work environments. But the retail that's working now is not the same retail that was working before the pandemic. High interest rates and escalating construction costs are changing the retail model and making existing centers more attractive than new development."

The Milwaukee Business Journal recently assembled a panel that included Brian Randall to get a better idea of why more investors are rethinking their approach to retail, the concepts that are proving to be the most successful and the challenges and opportunities facing the market.
