

Supreme Court Reaffirms First Amendment Protection For Associational Privacy

July 14, 2021

In one of its final decisions of the term, the U.S. Supreme Court reaffirmed heightened First Amendment protection for associational privacy in June. The Court ruled that government-mandated disclosure of the donors and members of private associations necessarily restricts First Amendment rights and government carries a high burden to justify such restrictions. The opinion has been greeted with approbation among First Amendment advocates and a diverse range of private associations.

The Court's decision resolved two challenges to a California rule compelling nonprofit organizations to disclose their major donors to the state as a condition of soliciting contributions from California residents. The cases are Americans for Prosperity Foundation v. Bonta and Thomas More Law Center v. Bonta. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit had upheld California's rule. The Supreme Court's decision reversed the Ninth Circuit's rulings in both cases and struck the California disclosure rule as facially unconstitutional under the First Amendment.

Chief Justice John Roberts authored the Court's majority opinion, which concluded that compulsory disclosure of an association's donors burdens First Amendment rights and government must prove that the burden is narrowly tailored to advance a "sufficiently important" governmental interest. The Roberts opinion started with the principle, first recognized in NAACP v. Alabama (1958), that "compelled disclosure of affiliation with groups engaged in advocacy may constitute as effective a restraint on freedom of association as [other] forms of governmental action," and quickly turned to clarifying the legal standard for judging the constitutionality of compulsory disclosure laws. Observing a dispute over the proper legal standard

Authors

Lee E. Goodman
Partner
202.719.7378
lgoodman@wiley.law
Jeremy J. Broggi
Partner
202.719.3747
jbroggi@wiley.law

Practice Areas

Election Law & First Amendment Litigation
Election Law & Government Ethics

to apply, the Court invoked the “exacting scrutiny” test set forth in Buckley v. Valeo (1976) and concluded that exacting scrutiny requires the government, in a facial challenge, to prove its compulsory disclosure regime is “narrowly tailored” to the government’s asserted interest, even if it is not the least restrictive means of achieving that end. Even a “legitimate and substantial” governmental interest “cannot be pursued by means that broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved,” the Court rules.

Applying that standard to California’s blanket disclosure rule, the Court concluded that California’s disclosure scheme is not narrowly tailored to the state’s asserted interest in preventing charitable fraud and self-dealing. Moreover, the Court questioned whether California’s interest was less about investigating charitable fraud and more about ease or efficiency of administering a charitable registration system. Mere administrative efficiency, the Court concluded, must yield to greater First Amendment rights.

Election Law News has been tracking the California cases as a timely inflection point for the Court to clarify First Amendment jurisprudence of associational privacy. Not since the Court’s 1958 unanimous opinion in NAACP v. Alabama has the Court had occasion to consider squarely the boundaries on state efforts to compel private nonprofit organizations to disclose their members and donors. Compulsory disclosure has been considered in the areas of political activities such as campaign contributions (Buckley v. Valeo (1976) and Brown v. Socialist Workers ’74 Campaign Committee (1982)), ballot initiatives (Doe v. Reed (2010)), and anonymous speech about public policy (McIntyre v. Ohio (1996)), but not since the NAACP decision had the Court ruled on the right of privacy in associations in a non-political context.

Among the issues the Court clarified:

- The principles set forth in NAACP v. Alabama (1958) continue to guide the Court’s First Amendment jurisprudence on associational privacy in all spheres of association – charitable, religious, civic, and political – and regardless of whether the mandated disclosure is public or limited to a government office;
- Government-compelled disclosure of private association donors is a per se burden on First Amendment rights automatically triggering judicial scrutiny;
- Courts must apply at least a high-bar “exacting scrutiny” and impose upon government the threshold burden to justify its compulsory disclosure scheme;
- “Exacting scrutiny” requires the government to establish a “sufficiently important” governmental interest that justifies compulsory disclosure and further prove that the disclosure scheme is “narrowly tailored” to achieve that important interest;
- Although the government need not prove its scheme is the “least restrictive” means for achieving its objectives, the existence of other less restrictive means is nevertheless relevant to the inquiry into the validity of the government’s asserted interest and its tailoring;
- Private associations and citizens may challenge a compulsory disclosure rule facially, and even if the government meets its exacting burden of justifying the scheme, the association/citizen then can assert an as-applied challenge by demonstrating the rule imposes special harm upon the association/citizen;

- In an as-applied challenge to an otherwise justified compulsory disclosure scheme, the plaintiff needs to demonstrate a reasonable risk of harassment, reprisal, or retaliation.

An issue the Court left on the table is whether, in some disclosure cases, strict scrutiny ought to apply. Although the Chief Justice would have held that exacting scrutiny applies to any First Amendment challenge to a compulsory disclosure, only Justice Kavanaugh and Justice Barrett joined that portion of his opinion. Justice Thomas concurred in the judgment but wrote separately to reiterate his view that “strict scrutiny” should apply to compulsory disclosure. Justice Alito and Justice Gorsuch wrote a concurring opinion suggesting they might also prefer “strict scrutiny” in at least some disclosure cases, but stating the California rule was so patently offensive (“The question is not even close,” Justice Alito wrote) they did not need to distinguish between strict versus exacting scrutiny in this case.

Meanwhile, Justice Sotomayor – joined by Justices Kagan and Breyer – dissented, arguing that the merits of the cases should have been decided in as-applied challenges where the plaintiff associations would have to bear the burden of proving the California disclosure rule imposed a severe harm upon their organizations and members. They believed the majority went too far and established a jurisprudence too protective of associational rights. They further expressed their opinion that these plaintiffs did not prove sufficient harm to their organizations as a result of California’s rule. The dissenting opinion’s absence of sympathy for the plaintiffs and their causes underscored for the majority the insurmountable hurdles private associations would continue to be subjected to in their efforts to invoke the First Amendment protections of NAACP v. Alabama (a legal and practical question raised in oral argument) and the need for broad facial protection.

Wiley filed two amicus curiae briefs urging reversal of the Ninth Circuit’s rulings, one on behalf of the American Legislative Exchange Council and one on behalf of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Both amici requested the Court to reaffirm heightened judicial scrutiny of compulsory disclosure rules. For additional information about Wiley’s amicus briefs, you can listen to our podcast and read further here.

Chief Justice Roberts’ opinion noted the wide diversity of amici: “The gravity of the privacy concerns in this context is further underscored by the filings of hundreds of organizations as amici curiae in support of the petitioners. Far from representing uniquely sensitive causes, these organizations span the ideological spectrum, and indeed the full range of human endeavors...”